

Speaker 1: Particularly because the Canadian manufacturing base in the U.S. has shrunk, Canada has developed more of a service economy to the extent that Canadian businesses are really, you know, distributors for U.S. parent entities or distributing U.S. supplied goods, increased investment in U.S. businesses may have actually have a positive trickledown effect for Canadian business...There is a possibility as well, that a decreased interest in foreign investment into the U.S. could similarly have a chilling effect on foreign, so ex-U.S., foreign investment in Canada, because our economies are just so integrated.